City pumping toxins into sewers: opposition

by Chris Clark

Hazardous waste water is being piped into the Montréal sewer system and its treatment is releasing dangerous gases, says the city's official opposition party.

The water originates from runoff pools at the Miron quarry garbage landfill, located in the city's north-end.

The pits of chemical-laced water are being treated with chlorine bleach and, last week, city workers began pumping the toxic liquid into the sewers.

"They are in the process of creating an environmental catastrophe," said Democratic Coalition of Montréal (DCM) researcher Gaetan Nadeau.

"They're emptying an 'evil soup' into the sewers."

The city has admitted that since December 13, over 20 tonnes of chlorine bleach have been dumped into the dump's runoff pools in order to neutralize the corrosive phenols contained in the water.

City spokesperson for the dumpsite Pierre d'Amour said the pits' water level are too high and must be reduced to prevent leaking into the surrounding water table.

D'Amour said this is what prompted the city to use the bleach.

"Before we can pump the water from the lake into the treatment plant, we have to eliminate the phenols. Bleach works much quicker and will allow us to bring down the water level," d'Amour said.

According to Nadeau, when the bleach mixes with methane in the water, a gaseous carcinogen, methyl-chloride, is formed.

"By eliminating the phenols, they meet the city's (environmental) standards, but they release methyl-chloride into the air," said Nadeau.

"The city has controls on what liquids can be dumped as sewage, but there is no control on the release of gases."

D'Amour denied the bleaching process is releasing methyl-chloride gas. "There is no methane in that water. Without methane no methyl-chloride can be produced."

Nadeau disagreed: "Our information from engineers on the (Miron) site say there actually is (methane present)."

In response to Nadeau's charges that permission had not been obtained to use the bleach, d'Amour admitted there was some miscommunication.

"We were in a meeting with the Minister of the Environment and the MUC (the association including Montréal and its suburbs). The MUC decided they wanted us to test the process in a lab first, but when we phoned, 8000 litres had already been dumped."

The dumping was stopped over the holidays and the city is now conducting laboratory experiments on the process.

According to d'Amour there are three methods for eliminating the phenols currently under consideration, one of which will be chosen next week in a meeting with the environment ministry and the MUC.

Nadeau complained that nobody wants to talk about the situation at the dumpsite and that the public is being misled.

The member of the city's executive committee responsible for Miron, Richard Brunelle, either does not know what is going on or is not telling the truth, said Nadeau.

Domestic workers lose status

by Kristen Hutchinson

The federal government may scrap an immigration program, worsening the working conditions of foreign domestic workers. Advocacy groups have called the proposal a serious human rights violation.

The program, which allowed foreign domestic workers to apply for landed immigrant status after two years, may be abolished in the next few weeks. The workers will be unable to attain immigrant status and will be forced to work with only temporary visas.

"The decision relegates foreign domestic workers at worst to the role of indentured servants, at best to that of guest workers," said Chief Commissioner Catherine Frazee of the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) in a recent press release.

Critics suggested abolition of the program would increase workers' vulnerability. "If they are having a problem being abused physically, emotionally or financially they are not going to complain because they'll be afraid to be sent back home," said Carol Salmon, a member of INTERCEDE, an organization for the defense of domestic workers rights.

"If the employer does not like one worker they can easily get another. They can always use that threat (against them)."

Frazee said eliminating the program will take "domestic workers back 20 years to a time when they had no security and few rights."

Concerns about the fate of the foreign domestic workers' program arose after the department of External Affairs sent instructions to embassies around the world, telling them to treat domestic workers as temporary residents and not potential permanent citizens. The government has not officially changed the foreign domestic workers' program, but an immigration employee contacted by the Daily confirmed the program will be cancelled.

Immigration Canada employee Gilles Coté said foreigners don't have the right to land in Canada and expect to become landed immigrants. "It was never a permanent program," he said.

Women wishing to receive immigrant status would be required to leave Canada after a certain time and reapply from their own country, he said.

The Ontario Human Rights Commission is calling the proposed changes a denial of human rights. "It will make it impossible for them to apply for citizenship," said Commission spokesperson Alan Shefman. "It will preclude Third World women from having access to Canada."

"For the Canadian government to ask them to come over here to work and then leave is offensive," said Salmon. "It's a definite step backward."

Domestic workers already have many problems, including low status, low pay, too much work and little respect. "For a lot of Third World women, domestic work in Canada is the way out of bad situations in their countries. But it is also a way into oppression," said Maria Ciampi of the Montréal Household Workers' Association.

"If we remove room and board and taxes foreign domestic workers are paid about $140 a week," Ciampi said. "They work overtime without time off to recuperate. Employers often take them for granted."

The present program began in 1981 to prevent exploitation of domestic help. But under the current Labour Standards Act foreign domestic workers still have little protection. The act protects some housecleaning work but does not include those who look after children. These workers are exempt from overtime pay, workers' compensation and unemployment benefits. Their only hope of achieving these benefits is through immigrant status.

Students' Society incorporation stalls

by Michael Newman

Three angry representatives walked out of a student council meeting early last December, breaking quorum in order to stall a vote on incorporation.

At the December 5 meeting, the executive tried to pass a motion approving a new letter of agreement between the university and Students' Society. Among other changes, the letter requires that Students' Society create an employment corporation.

Due to final exam pressures, many councillors were not present at the December meeting. Opponents of the employment corporation suggested that the vote be postponed due to the importance of the issue and the small numbers of councillors present. The executive refused to postpone the vote, and to avoid having the motion passed, Architecture rep David Gruber, Clubs rep Julie Dzerowicz, and Arts rep Ian Pilarczyk left the meeting.

"I took responsible actions in the cause of democracy," said Gruber.

The three councillors' actions violated Council rules, but no sanctions have been taken against them.

"The executive does not plan to take actions against them," says SSMU president Scott Mitic.

The employment corporation would give Students' Society autonomy over its employment practices. Presently, Students' Society staff are employed by McGill, and the Society does not have the power to independently hire and fire employees. Last semester's dismissal of former Society employee Don McGerrigle illustrated the difficulty of having McGill employees at Students' Society. McGill had to find a new job for McGerrigle after he was fired by the Society.

Council is unlikely to attempt incorporation of Students' Society in the near future, according to Gruber, though the administration has actively encouraged incorporation. Unless Students' Society incorporates it will continue to be legally considered a department of McGill university.

Opponents of the incorporation proposal questioned the merits of the plan and feared if it passed it might lead to executive abuse of power.

"What's proposed is just a corporation to hire and fire people," said Gruber. "The fundamental problem I raised about incorporation is only the executives have access to employee job descriptions. They would have carte blanche to interpret job descriptions as long as they maintain that job descriptions be confidential."

Gruber feels Council should have more power over the proposed corporation, because as it stands, the executive could fire employees independent of

Athletics Complex finally on track after decade of waiting

by Ivy Lam

Construction of McGill's athletics complex is likely to begin next month after more than ten years of discussion.

Students have been lobbying for the project for several years.

"Our hard work has finally paid off. The official approval of the city is the last red tape to cut through before we can start building," said Students' Society VP External Karla MacDonald.

The Comité Conseil de l'Arrondissement (CCA), the city's district advisory committee, approved the athletics complex project in December.

The committee's approval was crucial for the project, since its recommendations are likely to be followed by the city.

The city will make a final decision this month.

The CCA wanted the plan to include the removal of Molson Stadium's upper stands to allow for a better view of the mountain and public access to the complex at reasonable rates during non-peak hours.

The committee also asked McGill to allow the City to develop some of the land between the gym and the hockey rink for recreational activities.

Another hurdle was removed when Student reps successfully lobbied to rezone the area in which the gym will be constructed in Quebec City.

"They were really impressed with the student involvement in the project," said law rep Hélène Mathieu.

Area residents and the environmental group Les Amis de la Montagne have expressed reservations about the athletics complex.

The residents disapprove of building on the mountain and fear the new complex will contribute to student rowdiness in the area.

Les Amis does not support any construction on park greenspace. However, if the project does go through, they would like the city to include plans to demolish the Pine-Park interchange within the next three years.

"If the complex must be built, then people should have safe physical access," said Johanne Marcotte of Les Amis.

Les Amis would also like to have the final plans to go through the CCA and invite the public to give their opinions before construction starts.

"Without these conditions, Les Amis cannot give their support to the plans."

At the moment, the City has no plans to reconstruct the Pine-Park interchange within the next five years.

But MacDonald does not foresee the project being held up by the groups.

The city government has already given verbal support to the complex.

"At present, that area is noisy from traffic and uninteresting to the community. If the public will have access to the pool and other facilities after the complex is built, then the idea is a good one," said Jean-Emile Rocray, a civil servant and member of the Mount Royal Committee.

Students have been paying $7.50 a semester for the complex since a referendum was passed in 1982.

The project is expected to cost about $22 million. It includes a 200 metre running track, courts for racket sports and indoor soccer, a dance studio, and a weight training room.

The fieldhouse will have a seating capacity of 1200, allowing McGill to host national and international competitions.

The Currie Gym, built in 1939 for a student population of 4500, has been trying to serve more than twenty thousand students in recent years.

SSMUCorp put off

The Students' Society executive had to suspend debate on its plans to incorporate because of fear and confusion among councillors.

The motions under consideration at last week's Council meeting would have created an employment services corporation which would employ all Students' Society staff. Students' Society staff are currently employed by the university.

The employment corporation would not amount to incorporating the Students' Society, as previous reports had suggested.

Mitic claimed the new corporation was only a legal maneuver and did not amount to a change in structure of the Society. "It would not even have to go to referendum," he said.

Many councillors had reservations. Architecture rep David Gruber said there was a "potential for abuse of power" because the executive would also be the board of directors of the corporation. Gruber also asked who would be able to review job descriptions and salaries. He added that the new corporation would have no staff policies and no grievance procedures.

Some objected to passing the motion because of uncertainty about its consequences. "I can't feel comfortable voting for this when I don't know what the repercussions will be in three years," clubs rep Julie Dzerowicz while more trivial matters had gone to referendum, for example last term's change of the name of the Joint Management Committee to the Financial Management Committee.

And residence rep Monique Shabbeare expressed concern that the motion would not appear in the constitution or be brought to referendum.

Society president Mitic argued that the new arrangement was necessary and said councillors' arguments against the plan dealt with trivialities. "We are deciding whether to build a house and we're arguing over the colour of the lampshades," said Mitic.

And the executive argued in favour of passing the motion. "This is not a progressive outlook. We have no future if we're stuck with McGill employees," said VP University Affairs Rosalind Ward-Smith.

Architecture rep David Gruber replied that he thought the debate was more akin to deciding what type of ground to build the house on. Science rep Sherri Becker added, "I think we need to decide whether we need a house or not."

Mitic then made a motion to postpone debate until the incorporation committee could report back to Council. The motion passed.

Looking Up trashed

Council approved a ban on distribution in the Union Building of free of charge non-university publications, including the Montréal Mirror and the glossy mag Looking Up.

Science rep Aubrey Kassirer, who presented the motion, said no publication will be censored because of the ban. "Looking Up has a price of two dollars on its cover. They can still sell it at Sadie's if they wish," said Kassirer.

The ban will not affect the rest of the University. Architecture rep David Gruber, a former Tribune editor, said he had asked university VP Physical Resources Sam Kingdon to remove the Mirror from campus many times, and Kingdon had refused.

Both the Daily and the Tribune wrote editorials in favour of the ban last semester.

Still no general manager

President Scott Mitic described as "disappointing" two new candidates for the position of General Manager last December.

Students' Society is paying a professional search firm $12 000 to find a General Manager. The position of General Manager replaces the old position of Executive Director, which has been vacant since Don McGerrigle was fired 13 months ago.

Pay, pay, pay

A provincial student association of which McGill is a member supported recent fee hikes.

The federation's policy is that any fee hike must be accompanied by an equal increase to loans and bursaries. However, VP External Karla MacDonald said, "We must assume that this has not been done." MacDonald added that the federation will take some action would be taken if loans and bursaries are not increased. She could not specify the courses of action to be taken.

Lev says use drugs, we'll pay

Some special arrangements were made to get the new Student Drug and Accident Plan from Seaboard Life in place by January 1.

Students will be billed separately for the plan in March. In future, the insurance will be paid along with student fees in August and January. The bill for this term will be $29.20.

The special arrangements were necessary because fees normally start in September. "There were a lot of challenges to getting [the drug plan] in place in January. It goes against the University's normal way of doing things," said Bukhman.

Tuition bills were supposed to include a flyer describing details of the drug plan. But two Councillors at last week's meeting said they had not received flyers in their bills. Bukhman said flyers were available at the Students' Society desk for those who had not received them and that he would look into the matter.

The insurance company will not process any claims until it receives a list of eligible students from McGill. This is supposed to occur about four weeks into each term. Claims should then be processed in about two weeks.

Students may file a claim on a form available at the Students' Society desk or at health services. Students must then send the form to the insurance company and the company will mail them a check.

Students with comparable coverage may opt out of the plan by submitting an opt-out form, available at Students' Society. Those who wish to opt out of the plan have until January 27 to do so.

A student who has opted out still must pay for the plan and will be refunded the money by mail. Students may not opt out of the 50 cents per month accident insurance portion of the plan.

COMMENT

UnFEUQingbelievable

When you're shelling out $70 in extra tuition fees next year, remember that "our" student leaders have actually been asking for a fee hike for two years.

Student politicians from the Fédération Etudiante Universitaire du Québec have virtually begged the Education ministry to accept their outrageous package on tuition fees. Education minister Lucienne Robillard did just that over the holidays.

"Today was a great day for Québec students," Robillard said as she announced the six per cent fee hike while most students were out of school on vacation.

By FEUQ's plan, Québec students would accept "indexed" tuition fee increases — as long as business and government also "did their part". Corporations were meant to pay a special tax, and the government was supposed to release the funding cuts universities suffered through the '80s.

The government is always more than willing to soak students with higher fees. It is unwilling to fund universities better, or to raise money by taxing corporations. This is well-known.

If FEUQ and McGill's own student politicians were so eager to accept fee hikes, then at least they should have had some kind of plan to make sure business and the government kept their side of the bargain. Did they?

No. Karla MacDonald, VP-External of Students' Society, was asked at a student council meeting Thursday what action would be taken if the government did not increase subsidies to universities at the same rate as the increase in tuition fees. She said there would be "definite action by the Québec student movement".

But when pressed to say what sort of action she had in mind, MacDonald admitted she had no idea.

In other words, Students' Society and FEUQ have no idea what to do now that the government has followed its advice on raising tuition, even while it forgot the proposals to also raise funding to education. FEUQ made no contingency plans for such a scenario.

Two questions we would like to ask:

(1) How could FEUQ be so stupid?

(2) Are these people our student leaders, or are they collaborators?

FEUQ's compromise-attitude on tuition fee increases has greatly wounded the struggle for improved accessibility to post-secondary education. With tuition fees frozen at around $550 in the '70s and '80s, university attendance rates ballooned. Just between 1976 and 1986, 60 per cent more students enrolled in university.

It took the government three years to bump fees to $1500. Unbelievable.

LETTER

Beyond piety and pathology

To the Daily:

Could you bear another letter on the subject of idiopathic self-centred buttsuckers versus the sanctimonious self-satisfied non smoking conspiracy to deny everyone civil rights?

I offer a somewhat different perspective, being a relic of McGill of the late seventies when smoking seemed to have been the rule rather than the exception, and students looked like students (i.e. pale, pasty faced and overweight) rather than the crop of pluperfect physical fitness pod people that seem to have sprouted up all over campus.

I tell you sonny them was the good ol' days, many was the night that I smoked near on two packs of cigarettes during an all night study session...and that was before I got to the library.

But all good things must end. And cigarette smoking also. I had a heart attack last March (I was 31). The cardiologist said that the demon weed was a major contributing factor. I have no reason to doubt him, I trust his professional judgement, after all he's a McGill graduate too.

One of the things that made quitting quite simple was that I no longer had any real choice, it was quit or die, in the most graphic terms. The other thing that made quitting easier was the physical reaction I developed when exposed to cigarette smoke. I get pretty severe 'angina', nausea, and palpitations. I have to put up with this when I'm in a smoker's house, or at a bar, or anywhere that it is socially acceptable to suck on burning vegetables and paper. I respect the rights of buttsuckers to congregate in such places and even move around in public (outdoors) until such time as they inevitably fall down and die.

But I'll be damned if I allow my health and freedom of movement to be subject to the choice of another to break clearly defined rules of social conduct. If you smokers have a problem with lack of space at this university to kill yourself slowly in, take it up with the

Numbed men on strike

To the Daily:

While reading a recent issue of the Daily, I was not astonished to encounter the irrational question (all too commonly parroted among today's "intellectual" student body) posed by Mr. Bolongaro: "Why should students be the only ones who pay...?" Quite simply, they should pay for the sole reason that they are the ones receiving the service. Well, you imply, it is big business that really benefits in the end. Nonsense! Of course companies do not hire in the name of charity, but at the same time, most of the trained professionals produced by universities depend on industry. To those of you for whom it has not dawned, business is a network of mutual agreements by which everyone benefits, excepting those cases where the government steps in. Today, unfortunately, society is a man numbed by hypothermia and stripping off his clothes, not realizing that the warmth he feels is actually chill. A brilliant author once asked: What would happen if the men of the mind went on strike? The answer is clear. Those who refuse to see it also refuse to face reality.

Jan Carew to discuss Columbus and racism

This year marks the 500th anniversary of the most tragic yet most momentous series of events that have taken place in the history of the world.

Millions of people world-wide will join the celebrations of Christopher Columbus' arrival in the Americas.

Tales of great feats and legendary exploits carried out by Columbus will permeate the media and the global scene as the world exalts in all that Columbus is said to represent — civilization, bravery, good christian values.

But, for those whose lives were so adversely affected by Columbus' voyage and all that it precipitated, this is most certainly not a time for celebrating.

Africans (Blacks) and First Nations peoples of the Americas will be mourning the tens of millions whose lives were affected in unparalleled proportions in the history of the world — through slavery, colonialism, disease and, above all, outright slaughter.

Columbus unleashed and precipitated some of the most — if not the most — barbaric and savage acts of humanity this world has seen. Their impact has profound ramifications to this very day.

Indeed, when the indigenous Americans discovered Columbus on their shores and treated him so kindly, they had no idea what they were involving themselves in.

Yet this story has remained largely untold. When faced with the overwhelming evidence of the atrocities carried out by Columbus himself, not to mention the ensuing actions of the other European countries later, apologists for Columbus have tried to downplay the overwhelming evidence. His actions are dismissed as being merely a product of his time.

Jan Carew is no such apologist.

Born in Guyana of African, Dutch, South American Native and Portuguese descent, Carew is one of the many great writers, poets, historians, journalist, and scholars that this country and the Caribbean has produced. Carew comes from the same tradition that produced Ivan Van Sertima, Walter Rodney, George Lamming, and C. L. R. James.

Author of The Last Barbadian, Black Midas, Moscow is not My Mecca, and Fulcrums of Change: The African Presence in America, Carew is one of the leading authorities on Columbus and racism. He was formerly the Director of Culture for the ruling Ruling Peoples' Progressive Party in Guyana.

Carew will be speaking in Montréal today about the impact of Columbus in American and world history and why there should in fact be no celebrations for Blacks and First Nations peoples, whatsoever. This is also the subject of his upcoming book Rape of Paradise, which will be released during the middle of this year.

Carew will also discuss the alleged founding of Montréal (Hochelaga) by Maisonneuve, the role of Champlain, Cartier, and the Kirke brothers of England, as this year marks the 350th of Montréal.

The event is co-sponsored by the Sisterhood of Black Women, the Black Students' Network of McGill, and the St. Vincent and Grenadines Association and will take place at the Negro Community Centre at 2035 Coursol, Little Burgundy (Metro Georges Vanier) at 19h00. Entrance is free.

Charges against Mohawks condemned

by Michael Kaiser

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney claims that Canada has the "greatest judicial system in the world." To Mohawk activist Kahn-tineta Horn and Mohawk Nation spokesperson Dale Dione, this same system imposes genocide.

In addition, they say, the system has neither "legitimate" nor "legal jurisdiction" in Mohawk territory or on the Mohawk people.

Horn and Dione particularly condemn the 59 charges brought against Mohawks Ronald Cross, Gordon Lazore and Roger Lazore in the Québec Supreme Court. The trials began last October, and are based on Canada's claim that the defendants violated Canadian criminal law during the 1990 Oka stand-off.

According to Horn, counts 57 and 59 have received "permanent stays" due to the Crown's withholding of evidence (referred to as non-disclosure). Other counts have been dropped due to lack of evidence. The defendants now face a remaining 49 charges.

This outcome signals a small victory for the defendants and the Mohawk Nation. But it must not "overshadow the question of the legitimacy of the charges in the first place," warns Horn. The real question needing to be asked is if Canada has any "legitimate" or "legal right" to charge the defendants under the Canadian Criminal Code.

"The criminal charges belittle the Mohawk case, in addition to undermining the government's 1982 proclamation granting native nations the right to self-determination," said McGill anthropology professor Toby Morantz.

According to the 1982 Constitution Act, "The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed."

Mohawk Nation supporters have interpreted this as the right to continue developing as a distinct society within territorial boundaries defined by the Treaty of Ghent, the Jay Treaty and the Two-Row Wampum. In the latter treaty, made with the Dutch, both parties recognized each other's sovereignty and agreed on "non-interference in the other's internal affairs." The Mohawk have never surrendered these rights.

In the case of Oka, Morantz argues that the Mohawk warriors were defending their land and rights in accord with these treaties, which are protected by the 1982 Constitution.

The question of whether or not Canada has a "legitimate" or "legal" right to charge the Mohawk is virtually irrelevant, said Morantz. In the charges against the Mohawk, legitimacy arises from "might is right," with the mightier Canada dictating laws to the Mohawk Nation.

During the Oka standoff, it meant facing police and military forces. Now the Mohawk face the expensive and drawn out process of the judicial system.

Horn and Dione say that Mulroney's "greatest judicial system" imposes genocide on the Mohawk Nation by tying up the Mohawks' time, money, and resources while criminalizing their actions.

The aftermath of the 1990 standoff means hardship for the Mohawk people. Unemployment has surged. The Nation office, once run by paid staff, is now run by volunteers. Cigarette sales and gambling have been effectively stifled.

The high court costs drain what little money the community has left for social programming. Harassment from the police and the public continues.

"What did we ever do to deserve this treatment we're getting?" asks Horn. "A man gave us a simple answer, 'You upset us!'"

N.B. cuts university funds

by Dawn Mitchell

HALIFAX (CUP) — New Brunswick is the latest province to announce funding cutbacks to universities.

The minister responsible for post-secondary education announced in late December that the government could not afford the recommended four per cent increase in operating grants for universities. Payments to universities will be frozen for the next fiscal year.

"This means trouble," said James O'Sullivan, University of New Brunswick's vice president. "We'll probably have to increase class size, decrease student services, and raise tuition even higher than expected."

The measure to freeze payments was decided upon after the federal government said late last year it would decrease transfer payments to the province by $100 million.

The presidents of Mount Allison University, Saint Thomas University, the University of New Brunswick and the University of Moncton announced average tuition fee hikes of around $300 to $400 more than expected.

Tammy Yates, a UNB student councillor, said the government is trying to pit students against university administrators.

"(The government) wants to make the classes bigger, make us sit on the floor, and asks us to pay $2500 for the pleasure," she said.

Students plan to meet with several cabinet ministers and the premier within the next month to discuss the province's decision.

council. "We would need an elaborate system of checks and balances to make sure executives don't satisfy personal objectives by firing people."

Opponents of the employment corporation also fear it will mean Students' Society will not be able to offer employees the benefits they now enjoy as employees of the university.

In order to attract desirable personnel, Students' Society will have to either pay employees more or pay for benefits comparable to McGill's. Employee benefits would cost Students' Society significantly more than they cost McGill administration because the Society has so few employees.
